of backgrounds and expertise -- from law enforcement officers to deans of law schools, practicing lawyers, district attorneys, public defenders and judges. It has been particularly rewarding to gain the interest and critical involvement of local advisory panels and the Executive Committee who, while enthusiastically endorsing the general objectives of the project, have also been astute in their constructive criticism of the means which the project and area staffs have chosen to attain those objectives. The results of this year's program have indicated the need for an even more extensive, formative, and summative evaluation program to be held next year in order to assist the staff to an even greater degree in achieving the project's goals.
